Connecting With Kids

2/11/04

Statistics show that teenagers today are much more violent than teenagers of a generation ago. According to the Centers for Disease Control, murder is the 2nd leading cause of death among teens, arrests for aggravated assault doubled among girls during the 1990's alone, and one-third of teenagers say they have been in a physical fight during the past year. Experts say teenagers are more violent because the world is. Kids are surrounded by violence in the media—and too often, by violence and anger in the home. In the half-hour special, "A Violent Age," experts offer solutions for parents—ways they can help their children avoid not only becoming victims of violence, but ways they can avoid becoming violent themselves.

Connecting With Kids 3/10/04

Bigger, stronger, higher, faster; high school sports have never been so competitive. Many kids say that if they want to make the team and get playing time, they have to use some kind of sports supplement. But the choices are endless, and the advertising doesn't indicate the possible side effects or dangers. Dr. Christine Haller is a medical toxicologist with a five year grant from the National Institute of Health to study sports supplements. Some of them have contaminants in them, sometimes there's heavy metals; pharmaceutical products have been detected. She says that people probably don't understand that supplements haven't been standardized for testing or purity, or even for the absence of bacteria. By taking steroids, creatine, diet pills, or protein shakes, many high school athletes are risking their health to get strong and lean and what they call ripped. But the side effects are ripping many families apart.
